Do small cars have less cargo space?

Smaller cars have theoretically less cargo space, though many automakers utilize a hatchback design for their entry models, yielding effective storage space paired with fuel efficient turbo powertrains and an impressive list of technology and safety features.

What to look for when comparing cars based on cargo space?

When comparing cars based on cargo space, the most important features to look at are the car's cargo volume and the car's cargo volume with the seats down. Cargo volume refers to the total cubic liters of space in a car's cargo area.

Should you buy a large or midsize car?

If you don't need three-rows of seats or all-wheel drive, and don't care about SUV styling, a large or midsize car will deliver better fuel economy and still provide surprising cargo capacity when the rear seat is folded down.

What does cargo space mean in a car?

For SUVs and minivans, that means the total cargo area available when all but the front seats are folded down. That includes the second row for two-row SUVs, or the second and third row for three-row SUVs and minivans. For each vehicle we also include the cargo space when tall seats are in place and usable for passengers.

How do I choose the best car for my needs?

To choose a car that suits your needs, look for cars with high cargo capacities. These cars have enough space to accommodate passengers with the seats up or to store items with the seats down. You might be surprised by the ample cargo space some trendy cars offer.

Do minivans have a lot of cargo space?

For each vehicle we also include the cargo space when tall seats are in place and usable for passengers. The boxy shape of minivans gives them an advantage in cargo capacity, but buyers who also need off-road capability can get nearly as much cargo space from full-size SUVs like the Chevrolet Suburban, Ford Expedition Max or Jeep Wagoneer.
